Acknowledgments

The poems in God in My Throat first appeared, sometimes in different versions, in the following periodicals:

My utmost thanks go out to:

Drew Lackovic, who started me on this road when he told me a single Lilith poem was not enough and that I should write a book;

Greg Pape, ever-calm mentor of the mellifluous voice. I owe you an unpayable debt for working your way through this manuscript, making recommendations that made it worlds better than it was when birthed;

Jeanie Thompson, mentor and Alabama poetess extraordinaire, who, when I first decided to become a poet, cracked me like an egg, boiled me in wisdom, and poured me back into my shell a better writer;

Elizabeth Mentzer, sister deeper than blood, world-class baker, professional healer, best friend, dragon-dreamer and keeper of my sanity—I am lucky to have you;

Rosemary Royston and Heather Wyatt, fellow poetesses who share the passion of poetry, the thrill of inspiration, and the painful throes of revision;

Peter Hammarberg and Christina D’Airo, the oldest of friends who read Lilith in her roughest stages and then worked to give her a bold, worthy face;

Robert Ward, a kind and conscientious editor who saw the worth of this book and never once attempted to corset Lilith or make her a proper lady.

For my mother, Joanne.

You taught me the power of words, the value of reading, and the worth of being a woman.
Because you love me, dark side and all.
Because even when I do not, you always believe, and your belief is potent enough for two.

This, and every good thing I am and do, is yours.
He then created a woman for Adam, from the earth, as He had created Adam himself, and called her Lilith. She said, 'I will not lie below,' and he said, 'I will not lie beneath you, but only on top. For you are fit only to be in the bottom position, while I am to be the superior one.' Lilith responded, 'We are equal to each other inasmuch as we were both created from the earth.' But they would not listen to one another. When Lilith saw this, she pronounced the Ineffable Name and flew away into the air. Adam stood in prayer before his Creator: 'Sovereign of the universe!' he said, 'the woman you gave me has run away.'

From The Alphabet of Ben Sira Unwanted
Unwanted

Grass parts for my feet, my steps fall on barren soil, no blade brave enough to cushion my soles.
I have forgotten the feel of ripe earth, of how leaves look succulent in moonlight after the baptism of rain.

I am God’s only mistake.
I court the jealousy of angels—they bask in holy light but no one knows their names.
I blister my heels, queen of a court of silence and sand, I stand at the throat of the arroyo and howl my freedom to the purple of incandescent desert skies.

The coyote will not answer.
Chuckwallas stop mid-chew, berries blocking their throats, and the gray fox circles her kits, testing the wind, eyes glinting like new-minted pennies gone mad for the moon.
Only the sky-broad desert, with its shimmering parched breath and bones deep in its bosom is brave enough to defy its maker and whisper to me:

Lilith
Occupyng Children

Name the crawling beasts, and the walking ones,
and the critters that sweep like angels overhead far above the trees that you climb barefoot as you try to pat their bellies.
Enjoy the greendeep view, carve your unspoiled names into welcoming bark.
But whatever you do,
don’t think about hunger, don’t look at the sweet, red apples that dangle on low branches, don’t taste wild on the wind, don’t weigh the ripeness or nick the fruit’s waxy skin with your young, uncut nails and find sustenance.
I Will Not Lie Below

I will not lie below
your sweating, humping body, the shadows crossing your face slicing deep into your cheek and guarding your eyes as you plow me full of sons.

I will not lie below
and accept the dull rhythm of feeble, panting missionary-style sex when I know
by the burn in my belly there is more to be had than this hunched-over grunt and this bleak ceiling view.

I will not be crushed.
I will not lie back, tamed, and sleep in the wet spot to the end of my days.
I am no meek vessel to be filled by you when the nights are long.
I am the defiant daughter that dares speak God's name to break my bondage.
I will not lie below.
Wildclay Woman

God doesn't make many offhand mistakes. He knew what He built when He carved my face from the clay at his feet—a woman who walks barefoot through thistle, whose untame hair refuses all binding. Rain in my voice and thunder in my eyes, I was made to say no. I am every lost daughter who cavorts skyclad, who does her best to wear seven shades of purple disobedience instead of the white robe suited for communion. My hands are stained with blackberry juice—if I touched your cheek you would return bloodied by berries, anointed with my need.
Broken Catechism

I believe in God, the Father Almighty,

*I have seen His face and the frown of eternity settled upon my shoulders creator of heaven and earth, of superior sons and second-class daughters of beasts and serpents of sinister fruit and smartly dressed politicians

I believe in Jesus Christ, his only Son, *who walks on water and hands out free fish who wedded his Church and has no idea how hot a woman's blood runs

our Lord

*because our Queen was stolen for her treachery for her drunkenness on free air for her refusal to bow and be consumed

He was conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin Mary *who men draped in blue silk and called their Madonna even as they tore her son from her arms and nailed him to unforgiving wood He suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, died, and was buried all mourned his loss he was never forgotten the favored child of God

He descended to the dead where bones rattled like snakes he was welcomed and feasted no dry desert

no exile for the beloved

On the third day He rose again despite losing faith despite asking Why he had been forsaken

He ascended into heaven the rightful place of a son who has done his duty facing cruelty and breaking as far as the body may go and is seated at the right hand of the Father where an open space rankled from the whims of a daughter who preferred to cavort naked far from her planned prison He will come again to judge the living and the dead because what would we fear without judgment dogging our days bounding us to the grave ensuring our fealty we will be held responsible for the lesson that a woman's tears are not worth as much as a man's blood

I believe in the Holy Spirit, because I have seen it turn its hazy back on me when I wounded it with questions when I boldly asked Why? and practiced my Father for the son he would sacrifice the Holy Catholic Church, who makes woman into a demon huntress a screech owl to steal wayward souls who gives all a reason to chain their sisters the communion of Saints, who turn their backs on wisdom and take misery as their due who drink from a cup of old blood for the favor of God

the forgiveness of sins, except those unforgivable except pride except those of daughters who unbind their feet and dance unashamed

the resurrection of the body, which we must revile for the distraction it offers for the connection it brings to something greater than ourselves that is not owned by God and the life everlasting bought with tears and false wisdom spent in chaste song to please the ears of a Father who would abandon his get

Amen
I Am No Spartacus

My soft flesh is a target unfit for a warrior, my breasts make me mute, and what man heard when I said freedom was no more free pie.
I am no slave, no man’s hand held me down, none tempt me to struggle on behalf of a people unwilling to bleed for themselves.
I took no army with me to pillage strange lands, I never stole diamonds or draped myself in stolen silk.
I call none my own,
but those who make it across my dry borders of their own hard-got gains are welcome to my water.
I will hold their heads as they drink deep of my air and share what secrets beg to be found in the desert’s deep breast.
I am no Savior.
The sword and staff are too heavy and I have little need for flocks of tame sheep.
Trespasses

I don’t want you to forgive my trespasses. I want you to suck them like summertime candy and count them like tokens needed to win plush animals at the fair. I want to sneak in and snake fiery kisses down your chest until you sink your teeth into my sweet shoulder so your father won’t hear your sweat-drenched cry.

I will not forgive you your trespasses against me, and I will not forget them, how the span of your hands still warms the skin at the small of my back. I want to savor the memories like the last of the dates plucked from desert trees, and lick my fingers sober. How can I forgive you for feeding the green flame of my brazen desire? I want to harvest your need and your seed and hoard them for myself, to comfort me in the cold and faithful dark.
Purity

These white thighs have been merrily bruised, have borne the marks of a night's wild passions and the brunt of the weight of a man fully spent and leaden with sleep.
I will not be part of a sacrament where the Holy of Holies is a drachma between my well-made knees, men chanting in a circle of judgment to see when it will drop.
Does the lily judge the orchid for accepting the affection of the pollen-stained bee?
The pistil is not ashamed of her nearness to the stamen, and still the flower is allowed to bloom without a chastising Lord.
I cloak myself in the purity of choice, in the promise of the wind to keep me chaste while I dance nude over painted deserts, with my perfumed hair unbound drifting behind me like night.
A Lesson for Fathers

Take hold of the daughter who refuses a man the cushion of the snowy plain of her belly.

You have instilled in her a warrior's heart, no small thing to fit in the small package of frail bones and soft face. Be proud of the daughter who knows her own heart well enough to defy the one she honors above all men. Would you not shake the hand of a son who grew bold and strong, who raised his arm to salute, even as he left your house to become a man?
Unwed Bride

Naming the animals was busywork from on high to keep a simple Adam occupied and away from the breakables.
God knew his son
was average, bland, and built a helpmeet
to match his dull needs.
She never demanded
to ride rough on top, ever broke a fingernail in his gardenfresh flesh.
My sweet sister, daughter of the gloaming eve, easy to shame
with figleaves and fruit, I rode the desert’s broad back for empty millennia until a slow God sent me his second son, one more man who turned from the blaze in my blood and bade me make my peace with sweet subservience.
I left him hanging with the love of his father and a servile audience for comfort, just as I did with his clayfoot brother.
I keep my own counsel and whisper to waterless earth Breathe—
all the bold power of creation in my throat and none to call mine.
Witness

Witness: your eldest son holds your daughter down in the mud until she chokes and flails in submission. Witness anger’s slow burn as she learns from the view of your broad silent back that she will have to make do with her own weak limbs. She learns her own warfare in subtle tones, how to fade quickly from notice and anger the way a rich bruise fades from indigo sunset bursts into sick, yellow dawns. Will you take to your feet and witness for your flesh, declaring your neglect of this trampled bloom that clung to cold concrete and never flourished? Stand, open your eyes and bear witness for your child. I dare you to say it aloud: She is a daughter, and mine.
Hail Mary, full of grace, you were not even a whisper on the waters of God's mind when I would have asked your blessing on my exit

The Lord is with thee how does it feel to have birthed a fleshly Hallelu?
Did knowing God's love help you bleach the blood of your son from your cloak?

Blessed art thou among women does the praise of priests and the clamor of women piercing their knees with rosary beads bring you much joy?

and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus even dead, you are not woman, but mother, and remembered not for the fire in your eye but for your obedience

Holy Mary, Mother of God, bride and mother,
chaste and perfect,
would you counsel us
to follow in your shoes?
If we become ourselves will you turn your face from our prayers?
pray for us sinners, no blazing angel comes to tell us of our blessings, we have no comfort from kind carpenters willing to lend us a good name now and at the hour of our death.

    You raised the seed of God into a man,
and though our tasks are far more mild we have no signs as you did for guidance and oh, Mother, save us, we fear our reward

Amen.
Temptation

It isn’t the apple I crave, its juice running in rivers down my chin, drying to a sweet tacky trail down the slope of my throat to the hollow between my breasts, perfuming each step I take in this searing summer air.

It’s not the meat of an apple I want pressed against my lips, waiting for me to open wide and bite through the resistance of flesh to a nourishing core. It’s no apple I want to suck until all the flavor is gone.

No, I do not choose the apple that hangs from its branch, shaking its twiggy crown at my greed. The pulp I pick from my teeth isn’t from any meek brother of that round, domesticated fruit.

The wildgrown, thorny fruit, that calls my name and fires the kiln in my belly. I never cared how much blood the thorns demanded as their price: wild eyed and bloodied, I gripped that slippery gourd and I ate freedom whole.
God in my Throat

I cleared my throat of the last of the dust, and rubies fell from my lips to bleed at my feet.
The first rose we found tasted your nude thumb—I laved the wound with a gentle tongue that loved your flesh closed.
I whistled to the first dog and the birds waltzed to arias of new-legged frogs, the trees bowed like knights when I hummed you asleep our first night under young stars.
Our Father never told me I held such raw power in my soft, welcoming flesh, how the world would groan with my first accusation, how His secret name dozed, waiting to fly like a spear.
I would still have said no, but I might have whispered if I had known what I held, a newborn woman of holyfired clay with God in my throat and a will too green to break.
the remembering
We all walked into the sea to bathe together—the first one to support me as I knelt to wash my face was a keen-eyed wolf, and crows held my hair for the sun to shine dry.
It was a fine day, one of rest, made for the first love, until, full of such goodness, he couldn't help himself:
I am to be the superior one.

The clouds shamed the face of the close-burning sun, and the innocent ones walked away, one by one, shaking shaggy heads in a sorrow that echoed God's.
They sharpened their claws and honed the wicked teeth they never bared in our Garden, preparing themselves for long years of hunting.

Ah, sister Eve, original sin was already afoot and free long before you hungered. Even if my name was just a cloud across the moon blanketing you in darkness while you wept in guilt for the dangers he woke, I did what I could from afar. I should have written my own beginning, saved your daughters your shame and said I was First, and I saw.
Do not send your angels as hounds to dog my steps, crying with their wings thrust out to block my way.
You sit on your haunches, straw between your teeth as you pray they find words you were too cheap to purchase with your pride.
I am not interested in threats of infanticide, or how quickly wheedling turns to quicksilver anger when my answer doesn't change.
You cannot send seraphim to make weak apologies while you lounge skyclad counting berries on bushes and expect me to sashay my sorry way home, escorted by your surrogates back to a flaccid life where resentment blooms like azaleas in season over and over and over.
I Am

the woman who would break my nails
in your virgin-skinned back, who cannot be shamed by my own nude curves.

ravenous. I gorge myself on forbidden fruit and I worship at the altar of skin and scent and full-throated roars. I am not going to lie back and think of England.

God says I am
worth more than rubies.
I am worth more than the swords you should melt to build me a suitable throne.

Let the great I AM hear this:
I am.
I am
woman, and I am mighty.

I never saw my Father’s face, but His voice was thunder-thick velvet poured warm over my shoulders on a river-cool night, protecting me from the darker creatures He created that trawled the murky depths of deepening shadows. My Adam shone in the darkness, wearing a stormflash smile, his ruddy hand held out to help me through the brambles as we walked the virgin land to find our place. The rain was clear and sweet, the loamy earth welcomed my feet—every step we took was in the right direction, there was no sadness in the glory of a skyspilled sunset. It was a world beyond beauty, before judgment and mistrust stained the softwoven silk of our lives, we were sky-open and wild and thirsty for the flood of life. I remember Adam’s hand warm and certain on the small of my back, guiding me carefully through the maze of shrubbery that made up our garden home. I remember my Maker smiling down on me. I remember I was wanted.
Day Six

He saved us for last, too tired for anything but the platypus, dinner and a long artist’s nap. We were left with the world and none to show us the way. If we had been forced to lean on each other before the comfort of trees grew to give us shelter, we might have agreed to spend equal time on our backs in the grass, we might have believed in the glory of angels had we been here to see the first bird take wing. Waking in the dark might have made us less prone to err on the side of beauty. If we had seen the waters appear from nothing but light and dark, we might have been more careful keepers of the darkwater deep, we might have enjoyed the burn of the prideful sun, gloried in the stark serenity of a chaste moon’s cold light had we been there to see how empty Nothing could be.
Equality

What should it take for us to be equal?
Shall we be served the same measures,
to the last grain of rice?
Should I replace
my eyes with yours
to share a vision?
If I pluck a rose,
I should offer
half the petals
and split the thorns to be certain our wounds match.
Should we weigh our clay on the scales of justice and see who bears
the heaviest load?
See how my blood
mingles with yours, see how we look as one when viewed from afar.
Drawing Board

The desert is the oldest place, uninhabitable because God wanted a drawing board, in case He needed to start over. This is the Creation He kept in his holy pockets, a home to come to without the bickerchatternoise of man, beast, bug, and the constant hum of water. A reminder of the Great Empty, a life without children and wide, messy handprints smearing beauty from His art. A place to contemplate what He would change given the chance to take those seven days back and remake us in an image that didn’t hit the Holy One quite so close to home.
Questions for Angels

Angels sang God’s gold-showered praises before time, echo-less song hanging in the Void before Creation. Did none of you worry this strange, touchable world would capture the King’s eye to the exclusion of yourself? Did none of you dip your heads, shrink from the dull eternal duty of your song, preen gossamer wings for comfort and pray not to your winsome God, but for Him? Which of you had the might to stand aside, to marvel at the Making of copper-colored canyons and oceans of cerulean blues, to stand aside and watch vines curl about trees in a lovely strangle, to witness the birth of Reality without weeping for his loss?

You midwives, the first to see me step over fresh-built earth still warm from my Father’s hands and breath, who came to claim me when I fled my Father’s roofless house. You guardians, flashes of light between leaf-laden branches, dapplings dancing over obedient waters, shadows in the shape of things familiar to my heart, always from the corner of my eye, always one beat away from my fingers, itching to stroke that invisible softness that lived on the wind. You godmothers, who came pleading after me, warning me of the danger and destruction to come.

Could you have saved me, the stubborn warchild with still-wet wings stalking boldly to battle your God for my self, a womancreature, full of a need and wants your pure hearts could not bear to fathom? Did you see me as a fascinating proof of God’s science gone wrong, evidence of failure, as a shattering testimony of Love put to the test?
The Forgetting

It’s hazy. I couldn’t draw Adam’s face for you if I tried. I remember his skin was dark from sun and clay, and his eyes, whatever color they were, were always on fire for his God. I remember the colors of my arm after he tried to press me to the ground, all pain in pinks and ruddy purples. I was too new to be afraid, and marveled to learn that sunsets could glow beneath my skin. Sometimes I dream that first day, how breathing was a drink of the purest snow-bitten air, how my hips celebrated themselves, swinging in uncorseted space, in my sleep I can feel his eyes when he saw me that first time, my hair unbound, my new-made skin gleaming under the sun, and what caught his eye were my collarbones, so delicate and pale beneath his blunt fingers dark with garden earth. But I can’t remember his face.

Womansong

I birth the world between my thighs
life comes in a torrent of shit blood and pain back when gods had wives and wives had magic to shape the faces of men this vulgar act was holy

I am tempted and tempted and tempted until I crave the freedom of failure the taste of ripe fruit I fail I fall I free myself from the walls of my captor’s vast garden I unlock the world with an apple ey chain me to hearthstones under the watchful eyes of a jealous man-god thrown far from the sun stripped of my birthright told I am formed from mud they bind my feet to shorten my stride bid me cover my teeth when I smile

I hide my wisdom deep in the petals of a lotus that folds over my passion tinges my blossoms pink as a lover’s blush my daughters are shredded by plundering hordes I summon my bruises
my ragged natives
I bind my breasts and conquer a small piece of Rome before I meet Death with a sword in my hands

Mercy passes from me as tears through a sieve if the world draws no blood my body offers it freely to the pull of a blind moon I bleed like proud prey refusing the peace of death

I rule an empire with a pale fist and a fleet that blackens the sea with power I cast the seed of my language over the world small invasions to ripen in strange earth so that every place I go I am home

I am cast on far shores and enslaved
there is no home-feel in this soil for me I dance barefoot in firelight sending the drum-call to comfort my mother and brothers across the waters that rock the bodies of my cousins who were too weak for the journey I burn at the stake when the cattle take sick because I am a healing woman my daughters weep my father's face never wavers and my neighbors sell pastries as my face melts like yesterday's hope

shame is a chain many claim should bind me
the spark in my eye is damned as enchantment
my soft skin a sin
I am an affront to holy men
I am a gift

I feed my children with the coin of soldiers bread bought with my body when we win the war I am dragged shivering and nude through the mud my head shaved for my shame as the other survivors hurl heavy insults through the windows of my soul they sear my body with lye to see if I burn the same as they do my sons become lampshades to dampen the light the ashes of my men rain down soft black tears smudge my cheek tattoos of grief to match the numbers on my arm my hips are thin and frail and strong and wide my breasts have suckled warriors and poets

my soil is rich and fertile for planting I am abundantly barren with sorrow I dance on bloodied feet and serve the cold dish of wisdom to kings I am always naked and open I am the bearer of secrets everything comes to me for comfort everything comes to me to die ten hack each other to pieces and spit children over the fire the cup of innocence that feeds the world is nearly spent the brim spoiled

I hoard my portion to pour into your pink mouth before your teeth grow sharp with knowledge Lilith speaks
For My Unborn Son

Better you stay in the un-world, unborn this place is not fit for children, nor men.
Even Lucifer has taken his light and gone home.

I would never place you on a stone in the forest.
The thought turns my throat to ash, my praise to dust.
Let the naked altar stand as proof of a father's cruelty.

My mother’s mother a thousand times back traded your life for an apple.
I would have struck a better bargain, and cooked the serpent over an open flame, under that fruited tree.

God never asks permission, He would steal your rib as you sleep and fashion your destruction.
Would you follow love into desolation, if love chose desolation over you?

You would be made a soldier in an unwilling army, to bludgeon hope
from the breast of the natives.
I will steal your rifle and replace your fingers with roses the color of blood, your eyes with pearls of peace.
On Loving Men

It's so easy to fall into them when they smell like new-turned earth and offer to share their shade when the summer sucks your breath and leaves your lungs thirsting for something more than stale sustenance for something greater something untame that refuses to lie mute and still in your hands for their strength that can leave you vulnerable as new-mown grass under concrete-calloused soles that easy aura of ownership you can drape it over your shoulders you can wear them like armor and bear them into battle and let them bleed for you as you bleed for the moon into the clay from which their sturdy bones are made Letter to Jezebel

"...So they threw her down: and some of her blood was sprinkled on the wall, and on the horses: and he trode her under foot...And they went to bury her: but they found no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands."
—"2 Kings 9:33,35 (KJV)

I.

Ah, Sister, didn’t you know better than to outpace your men? Rule as you would, you were never safe or held favor in their eyes. They called you Queen to your face, but what did they whisper under cover of night, away from the shadows cast by your ancient, golden gods? The same ones who shared your charms hissed like snakes in the dark, Harlot! and Whoredom! even as they still smelled of your musk and the echo of your lipstick branded their mouths. Your subjects danced in solemn rows, beseeching your maids to throw you from the balcony where once they cheered you, and tossed orchids that rotted underfoot in the streets. A talented whore, too female to be King, too powerful to be trusted, too immodest to live, too stubborn to bend.
II.

Oh, Sister, mighty Queen no more, men are born with destruction sung into their marrow, and none love the wiles of a wolf-cunning woman, no matter how high you piled your hair. If you had not paved their path to murder, you would still have ended a dog's dinner in the courtyard, victim of a reach that too far exceeded your grasp, a quarry too fine not to mount and display as a prize. You slighted that fierce God of men who woos with blood as you did with your uncovered breast and the intriguing knot of your labyrinth of braids. Not one loved you, Sister. Not one begged you to stay your daggered hand as you slaughtered the prophets, none warned you that your gods might stumble and fall. You never considered where you would bury the bodies of your priests, so certain of victory and the malleable spirits of men, you never once trembled. Steady your green eyes in the face of men’s power. Steady your hand on the dagger. Steady your scream in the long fall, steady your reckless slide headlong against the soldiers of God.
III.

Sister, you would rage at how slight a burden you make in a cloth bag on my shoulder, how none but dogs came to clean your royal blood from the stones.
Even in death you stir, fierce with desire, against all consequence that comes with making men small.
Even in death you would bargain, your bloodied bones rattle reaching blindly for power no man would let you keep, crying out against the God who denies a woman’s sway.
Sister, who but I will sing for you, a dead Queen drunk on her king’s power and full of his sons?
Who will sing of the men who tasted your bold truth and left bitter with the knowledge that they could not make you meek?
Who will teach my daughters to wield the power in their voice?
Sister, I am left with your bones, your blood on my good shoes, and a God-struck mob that loves you better dead, that loves you better quiet, that loves you better with no body to distract them from their prayers.
It Would Not Have Been Well

for me to stumble in at dawn reeking of musk and smoke from whatever I could blaze and put to my lips in the garden.
It would not have been well to have argued with Adam, to have thrown clay pots and aired our marriage woes while You trained David to sing and bear a crown.
Moses would have turned and whispered to the Jews that there is a quiet nobility in the life of a good slave, doused the burning bush and gone on his way.
No carpenter would have believed me untouched and lent me his good name as I grew big with Your child.
Men might have set down their stones and danced with condemned whores if I had stayed where I was.
How could You awe them, strum their deep fear of the dark if they knew the mighty I AM could not rein in his daughter any better than they could resist my lithe form standing nude in the sun?
Confession

Forgive me Father,
for I have sinned.
I have lain nude in the desert and enjoyed the crush of sand.
I gloried in knowing the heat of my body could melt it all into glass, that the firstborn sun might reflect my pleasure and burn the ice from your eyes.

It has been millennia since my last confession, since I ran from your house in a fit of primal pique.
My heart is too big for the ego of such a small man, who would have me see the world you have wrought in only primary colors, with none of the indigo shades that intrigue me to wander.

Forgive me Father,
for I have sinned.
I embraced the deadlands that forsook your love to court my wildclay self, and I have stayed my hand rather than reach across the aisle of oceans to test your temper again.
I have grown ripe on the fruit of knowledge and love of myself.
Forgive me Father,
for I am not sorry
and I cannot come home.
Desert Goddess

It drew me to its bosom of dry death and held me until the sand wound like silk around my skin, and gowned me like a bride, bearing a bouquet of poppies and paintbrush.

Exiled by harsh masters, I am welcomed by this land of parched beauty.

I am the missing ocean this beach has thirsted for, my saguaro sentinels praise my nude form, even the proud sun declines to burn my shoulders.

None make war on me here.
If I returned I would strangle in that damp, verdant air,

I would choke on the perfume that pervades that lush garden, drowning for lack of dust.
The Book

If I had written the book I would have had men wash my sisters’ feet in rosepetals and tea, and no fruit would grow that shouldn’t be eaten.
I would have decreed punishment for ignorance instead of for longing for wisdom and love,
and every woman
would be made queen who banished the soldier that dared crown her younger brother with thorns.
If I had written the book
I would have given better directions to Heaven and appeared as myself, not flaming foliage,
to counsel stray men.
I would have been selfish, I would have kept myself as the heart of the story
if I had written the book.
Lessons for My Daughters

Do not debase your lovely locks.
Never wash a man’s feet with your hair, for God has counted every strand and named them holy.
About some things, He was right.

God gave you a voice. Use it well even if it drives Him to thunder.
Gifts unused are gifts unwanted, and what will you do if your daughters are born unable to say no?

Even exile can be bountiful when you have earned it with grace.
Who challenges the desert for the love of the sun?
Take what space you will, carve a home.

Never turn your face from sorrow.
There is no world so gay that grief will not add spice to a proud life.
   Be mournful to create shades of meaning. To create is a joy, and godlike.

Be always wary of the spilling power in your body. Men never forget. From innocent games in the sea, water sparkles like jewels from your nipples, and men are ever thieves of such beauty.
Dear Doctor Oppenheimer

How many angels can dance on the head of a pin?

When no angels volunteered, you found atoms were small enough. Like God, you bent down to blow your breath against helpless things and incite them to war.

Does having an answer carry you closer to God? Did you stop to ask yourself where does a newmade god lay his head to rest? after creating a sun so bright it baked the ashes of your neighbors' shadows into low garden walls, and made children into angels before they realized they had stopped breathing?
There is more here in the desert than bones, stones and sand, more than this whirlwind of fire you watch from behind safety glasses, far from your own family in their flammable cotton sheets, asleep while you birth your Hyperion error.
Others will see. They will worship with war tearing at their faces and accord you respect.
Pouring death skyward, you dangle destruction like a gem from your chains, convinced you are no slave as long as you can tame something smaller than men.
You are the Apocalypse, a demigod of fire,
a destroyer of worlds.

Like other men, you are blind to the solace of the desert, you see a dead space to practice your wrath, a place to wield your weapons, measure success in meters, in how high into an uncrowded sky the mushroom cloud climbs.
You see an empty kingdom where you can build a hateful ladder to heaven, a way to set God’s house ablaze and prove you are worth more than breath and clay.
You try so hard to rule the sandbox your Father built you never see the answer:
destroy the world, no matter.

Turn your brothers inside out and kindle a fire in their children that will melt the marrow in their bones before they learn to walk, no matter.

Burn it all and the angels will never pause in their praise.
Even with atomfire at hand, such thunder never rattles Heaven.

This is not the way home, and you are too young to know.
Thorns

Dear Brother,
We have never been properly introduced, but a crow delivered a crown of thorns and I recognized your tainted blood. Mine has the same bitter flavor of trial. I could not save you from your calm suicide, I am not worth much as sisterly protection against men with spears. I wonder if you felt a hollow echo of love, my breath on your cheek as you slept undisturbed. I understood your need to save the hopeless, I saw every one you plucked from the mud. My little brother, reaching across time, saving me by proxy with every whore you never stoned. Brother, we are family in more ways than one—the thorns love me too.
Sister to Sister

I hear you bought into the rib tale and take your role seriously. You won't come to see me. Do what you feel you must, but let me share some things with you, sister to sister.

I left a roach clip and a decent-sized stash under the last tree at the west wall, and the sexiest fig leaves can be found on the highest branches, but be careful—they don't grow back as fast as the others. Our Father is nearly as jealous as Adam—if you stay, be meek. Find a kind spider to weave a silk scarf to cover your raucous hair, find the hour between trust and myth to say your prayers, and a soft creature to comfort you when your simple man strays and finds his fists too heavy to keep to himself.

I wish you well of your walls, I wish you happiness among the orchids, under branches that look like bars in the tarry shadows of night, when you lay your cheek against the moss that cushions the rivers that sing you to sleep. I didn't stay long enough to sample the fruit from that tallest tree, but the earth trembled and told me of your bravery. We are sisters, after all, even if we are set to be oceans apart and on opposite sides of everything holy. We share the moon, and men, and a knowledge of God that surpasses the shallow memory of faith.

Grow healthy in your garden, Sister, grow strong and keep a sacred space to keep your soft soul safe. Remember me, if you would. I can picture you:
reading this with narrowed eyes the same color as my own, a hand on your hip, an apple core at your feet—judge me for leaving, but we are not so different, sister. Ah, Eve, look how both of us are outcast as the price for craving more than our lot.

As the soft greenness of vines pry through stubborn brick, as a woman's light touch may pry through the concrete layers man gardens in his heart, so shall I pry you free.

Raise your head, unbend to the sun.
Raise your hands, you have spent too long callousing them, bowed in stone shadows to one you may not even Name.
Raise your eyes, I will not blind you.

Honor your flesh, it holds you up.
Honor your flesh, it makes you whole, and keeps you from collapsing back to the clay from which you were made.
Hold yourself dear before others, and let them not dishonor your flesh.

To whom do you owe your allegiance?
I say owe your mother, for she birthed you in blood.
I say owe your father, who bloodied his hands to feed you.
I say owe yourself and be done with judgment.

Name the creeping beasts and every growing thing in whatever tongue you wish.
    They have Named themselves and have no need of your proclamation.
Forget trees and fruit. For wisdom, Name thyself.
